THE GAZETTE.

Mr. Cleveland's Force Bill Record and Mr. Wilson.

Washington, May 13, 1892. To the Editor of the Alexandria Gazette. In a letter last month to your journal on the subject of Mr. Cleveland's attitude on the force bill I showed how he had failed all during the spring of 1890 when the bill was before committee and Congress; how during June, July and August when it was a topic of discussion in Congress and by the public press; also when it had passed the House of Representatives on July 2d, 1890, and later when the fall campaign was in progress and it was so important in order to defeat the bill to have an emphatic popular condemnation of this atrocious measure, he had remained conspicuously silent until about 31st of October, just before the election before he had uttered a word or two of disapproval so vague and brief that it proved clear-ly that he really cared nothing about the subject. To say that all this time Mr. Cleveland had no "opportunity" to express his sentiments on this revolutionary measure is simply ridiculous. It is pleading the baby act. There is not a newspaper in New York whose columns are not open to Mr. Cleveland every day. Then there is the Associated Press always open to him or to any ex-President—as open to him in July, August or September, 1890, when public opinion was being formed on this great subject, as it was on the 31st of October, when he put forth his little manifesto on topics utterly insignificant in comparison. A brave, honest, consci-entious public man will make his own opportunity. No man can doubt that at a word from Mr. Cleveland a great public meeting would promptly have been held in New York to protest against this outrage on the constitution and the northern people. One-tenth of the "influence" employed by his New York friends to subsidize newspapers and corrupt the agencies by which the national democratic convention is to be organized and controlled, would have sufficed to get up a monster meeting in New York city which would have appalled the conspirators at Washington and given a fresh impetus to such manly champions of the people as Gorman, Faulkner, Pugh, Daniel and others I could name in that long and doubtful combat. But Mr. Cleveland did not once lift up his hand. Put all his late and tardy utterances on the subject to-gether and they are not worthy of a sophomore speaking to a debating club.

He suggested that Mr. Cleveland lacked "opportunity" for an utterance, and in a haughty fashion said in effect that to accuse him of lukewarmness was "unjust and untrue;" and that it was "humiliating to him as a southerner that any southern man should try to make capital in such a way against Mr. Cleveland." I am not one of those who believe that when congressmen open their mouths every on else shall shut up. astray like all the rest of us. It was provoking to me that Mr. Wilson should dispute the recorded facts of history which it was his opportunity and duty to know; and I could not help feeling irritated at his severe reflections upon those including numerous journalists and democratic representatives and Senators who had made this very charge against Mr. Cleveland. His suggestion that he was "humiliated" on their account was very offensive and uncalled for. Irritated at this style of his reply I commented on Mr. Wilson in rather sharp language. But I am moved by the recollection of kindly personal relations in the past with Mr. Wilson to believe that he did not mean to be offensive, or to reflect upon those who, like myself, had preferred this charge against Mr. Cleveland, and that he wrote incantiously without taking the pains to refresh his memory of the record of those times. I am reluctant to believe that he would willingly misrepresent any public transaction and assume any moral superiority over his opponents in this matter as his language seemed to indicate. I freely concede his eminent ability and public services, and I am only sorry that his talents were not employed as they onght to be in showing how this ingrate failed to do his duty to the party that had honored him far beyond his merits by two Presidential nominations or to speak one word for that section which the robbed, impoverished and most foully abused had given him a support as generous and unstinted as it had ever given to Lee or Jefferson Davis.

There are two Clevelands—one of them the ideal Cleveland. Many thousands of honest, patriotic, intelligent, but ill-informed men in the south worship the ideal Cleveland. They have been told very little about him by the professional politicians. Speaking the honest, plain truth seems to be one of the lost arts now-a-days. Indeed, it is not always safe to do so, and the Rev. Aminadab Sleek was really very world-ly-wise when he remarked: "The truth is not to be told at all times, at all places, to all persons." The other Cleveland—the real Cleveland, who looks on the south as a mere province given over to violence, treating the negroes badly; the Cleveland importing negroes from the north to fill District offices; inviting them to his special receptions, dodging the force bill; insist ing on the internal revenue taxes and pandering always to the money power and the rich creditor class; insulting the south in his public addresses and always imagining himself better than a PHOTOGRAPHS.
